

Subject: Florida Bill 1557

Dear Mr. Chapek,

I am a simple stay at home mom of four children. My family is not important to you. Until this morning, we owned a small amount of Disney stock, tried to get to Disney World every couple of years, and have loved all things Disney for a long time. Today, our relationship with Disney came to an end. If Disney is not going to support protecting young children from activist teachers and predators, then we cannot trust Disney any longer with our children. I know the little amount of Disney stock we sold this morning will have no impact on your company whatsoever, but at least we will not be part of a company who seems to care more about appeasing a woke twenty something twitter mob than keeping young children safe.

The Parental Rights Bill was passed to keep inappropriate sexual content out of kindergarten through third grade. This isn't controversial: it's about protecting children ages five to eight. My youngest child is seven years old. She loves princesses and baby dolls, has huge gaps and missing teeth when she smiles, thinks her teachers are rockstars, and hugs everyone. She is in first grade. There is absolutely no situation where sexual instruction is appropriate for her. None. I would be very concerned if any adult thought otherwise. The bill is not anti-gay, anti-straight, anti-anything. It is pro-child and pro-parent. It is sad that we need these types of bills at all, but we have seen first-hand how activists disguised as teachers use their power to promote inappropriate content to children and then try to hide it from parents.

How does a CEO of a company that caters to families and children oppose a bill that protects young children? We would have been content for Disney not to weigh in at all, but now that you have, I'm sure you realize there is no gray on this issue: you either support protection of young children or you support groomers and activists.

CEOs across America continue to let screaming twenty somethings on twitter lead them by the nose in this crazy direction, destroying our society along the way. We desperately need adults in the room to stop this woke hysteria, and this current group of CEOs continue to fail.
